'Create' Opens at Washington State University's Museum of Art

Tim Buckwalter

As part of our diabolical plan to cover the world in NIAD art, we're super-pleased to tell you the traveling exhibition, "Create," in which we are a part runs January 23 through April 5 at the Washington State University's Museum of Art.

From the museum's website, about the show: "Create is a major group exhibition presenting an exceptional selection of the most important works created over the past twenty years by artists involved with the three pioneering non-profit organizations: Creativity Explored, Creative Growth Art Center, and the NIAD Art Center. These organizations were founded with the belief that exceptional creativity can emerge in anyone and they support the work of artists with developmental disabilities through a unique and highly successful approach to group studio practice. "The artists featured in this exhibition—all of whom have some form of developmental disability—possess the talent, independence, and depth of feeling that makes the most powerful art possible,” says curator Lawrence Rinder.”
